Questions thirty-seven to forty are based on the following talk. Good afternoon, listeners, and thank you for tuning in to Green City Radio. Today I want to talk about green rooftops, an idea that is becoming popular in many big cities. In our city, the Central Library recently turned its roof into a small garden. There, volunteers grow vegetables, herbs, and a few flowers. But a green roof is not just pretty. First, plants help keep a building cool in summer, so people use less air conditioning and save electricity. Second, the garden takes in rainwater, which lowers the risk of floods during heavy storms. At the moment, about thirty volunteers take care of the garden, and last month they shared more than forty kilograms of vegetables with nearby families. Some people worry that a roof garden is too heavy for old buildings, but engineers check the structure first, so it is safe. If you would like to help, the library is looking for volunteers every Sunday morning. You don't need any experience. The whole afternoon feels like a small picnic, and many families come together. Just bring a hat and a bottle of water. Registration is free on the library's website. Question thirty-seven. Where is the garden mentioned in the talk?
