29 and 30 are based on the following report. Pruning or cutting off branches from a tree can remove unhealthy or unneeded parts of a plant and improve the growth of flowers and fruit. Generally the best time to prune is in late winter before spring growth starts. Dr. Doug Welch, a plant expert and a professor at Texas A&M University, offers the following tips. When you prune, first remove dead, broken, or diseased parts. At the place where the problem begins. Then, remove any branches that touch another branch. Leave only the stronger one or the one that is in a better position. But Dr. Welch also suggests not going too far with pruning. A lot of pruning can be avoided if you choose the right place for your plants. By doing this, the plants will grow the way nature has originally designed. As Dr. Wells put it. People can oftentimes ruin what nature has created. So be cautious with pruning.
